New York-based painter Tom Koken's exhibition, Phantom Limb, offers two suites of paintings – his Dissolution paintings and his tiny Branches works (in oil on paper) in which the partial image is made so cunningly and so forcefully present that you don't notice the absence of the whole.

The Dissolution paintings show what appear to be bits of decorative gridwork – the remnants of what looks like wrought-iron fencing – that have somehow or other survived some erasing process and now remain as evidence of larger patterns, to be completed or rebuilt only in the imagination.

The suite of Branches pictures – each only eight by 9½ inches – offer another kind of partialness. Here, in each of these rather endearing little oils on paper, a system of tree branches, (none of which is arboreally exact but delivers, rather, the idea of branching in itself), spreads across the paper in what the gallery charmingly characterizes as a space where “mark-making and picture-making intersect.” The “branches” appear to have begun as exploratory marks, but have grown – as a tree might – into lattice-like patterns, the very embodiment, in a sort of rudimentary, diagrammatic form, of nature's abhorrence of emptiness.
